Programmed cell death in eukaryotic cells is critical in processes such as tissue homeostasis and the development of cancer. The vast majority of cell deaths are apoptotic in nature. Only a small percentage of cell deaths are necrotic. Necrosis is morphologically characterized by cell swelling and rupture, followed by spillage of cellular contents. However, necrotic cell death is distinct from apoptosis, in that apoptosis is typically a tightly controlled and highly regulated process. Apoptosis is a type of programmed cell death. The term “programmed cell death” as used herein means that the death is intended and programmed by the cells themselves to occur at a particular stage of development or under a particular set of conditions. Apoptosis occurs in all multicellular organisms and in response to a variety of stimuli including infection, changes in the genetic makeup of a cell, or damage to the cell or to the surrounding tissue, such as physical injury, radiation, and changes in the extracellular matrix. In apoptosis, a cascade of intracellular events leads to the orderly death of the cell, without the leakage of cellular contents (e.g., resulting in cell swelling and/or rupture). Apoptotic pathways can be controlled by the intracellular levels of second messengers. For example, in apoptosis of thymocytes, cytochrome c is released from mitochondria and interacts with Apaf-1, forming the apoptosome. Apoptosome formation leads to caspase-9 activation and subsequently to activation of the effector caspases (caspase-3 and caspase-7) that eventually induce the characteristic changes of apoptosis. Various proteins (or proteolytic fragments thereof) play an important role in apoptosis and cancer. For example, the Bcl-2 family of proteins regulates apoptosis. The anti-apoptotic Bcl-2 protein inhibits the release of cytochrome c from the mitochondria. On the other hand, the pro-apoptotic BH3-only protein Bim induces mitochondria permeabilization and cytochrome c release. The Bcl-2 family of proteins includes both the anti-apoptotic (e.g., Bcl
