"We have absolutely no alternative," said Richard, a 26-year-old who identified himself only by the first name of his godfather. "If I am wrong and it is not the case, my godfather will have to pay the price." A few days before, Richard had posted a message on Facebook saying that he knew of two young men who had just returned from Syria and were preparing to carry out an attack in Europe. Richard said he had alerted authorities to the threat. He declined to say who the two men were or to give any other information. "We don't want to be tricked. What we want is to be treated like a human being," said Richard, an engineering student who plans to quit his studies and move to the country of his parents, who do not want to speak about the incident. "I don't want to be on a list of suspects." But Richard said that the police have offered little help. The authorities have not been able to say exactly when the message on Facebook first came in. They have not yet been able to reach the two young men on Facebook, whose profiles have been deleted. And even though they know the profile of at least one of the men — the one who planned to carry out the attack in France — they say they are not actively looking for them. The police have said nothing about the threat. "Nobody knows why they are only beginning to investigate now," Richard said. "But it is clear that they want to be the ones to find the attackers." In France, about 200 people a year are arrested on suspicion of planning terrorist attacks. In a country of roughly 62 million people, they represent a minute fraction of the total population. "The state has a very important role in all of this," said Alain Choueiri, who runs the Association for the Prevention of Terrorism, an organization that tracks the activities of radical Islamist preachers and their sympathizers. "It is much more than the police."The best Nintendo Switch games you can buy today The Nintendo Switch is a big deal.
