Brushes In Photoshop, the brush is a tool that behaves exactly like the pen tool but is used to paint instead of draw, because a brush is not marked with lines. Brushes contain an infinite number of options, which allow you to change the following variables: A texture file that can include a variety of different types of textures that will show when you apply the brush. These types of textures include rubber, glass, wood, and stone. A size. With the default settings, a brush is very easy to use and it can easily reproduce the size and shape of the brush strokes. However, with more control over the brush, you can achieve a brush stroke that is more detailed or more delicate. The shape of the brush. With this, you can change the shape of the brush, such as round, square, or star. The opacity. You can choose from none, light (around 50%), medium (about 85%), or full (100%) opacity. A brush with a full opacity is extremely useful for painting. To achieve various effects, like negative painting, a brush with a lower opacity is necessary. Directional Strokes By selecting the brush in the Brushes menu, you can find a list of preset brushes, which can be of different sizes and shapes. However, you can add your own brush by choosing the brush you want and pressing Command + J. To create a new brush, click on the brush on the palette or press Command + B to open the Brush Toolbar, and then the brush tool. Click and drag on the canvas to create the brush. Alternatively, you can use the Brush Tool in the toolbar to create a new brush. To quickly paint or draw on an image, you can click on the canvas, enter Edit mode, and then use a pen tool or brush. Choose a Brush The dialog box that opens is called the Brushes palette, which allows you to see all of the brushes available in Photoshop. You can use this palette to select a new brush, add a brush to the selection, and choose a brush size and opacity. Click on the Density/Opacity menu and select the brush you want, then click on the brush size you want and select the size from the popup menus that appear on the right side of the dialog box. Alternatively, you can use the Brush Size menu at the top of the brushes panel to select a brush.
